

Behavioural Mode Assessment

What does this report tell me?

Your personality is a particular pattern of behaviour and thinking prevailing across time and situations that differentiates one person from another. It is made up of many different elements, some innate, some learned. Apart from our inherited traits we develop ways of being and doing based on all kinds of good and bad experiences, value decisions and external influences. This complex system of attributes, behavioural temperament, emotions and mental energies is impossible to fully comprehend, let alone assess and quantify. Therefore the MiRo system looks at what can be observed, such as our habitual behaviours.

These behaviours are determined by how we unconsciously perceive our environment and ourselves in relation to that environment. By measuring behaviour psychologists and psychotherapists such as William Marston and Carl Jung have identified four main Behavioural Modes that are open to all of us. MiRo refers to these Modes as Driving, Energising, Organising and Analysing and we use these Modes in order of our own preferences.

The order of preference in which these behaviours are used is as follows:

- Leading Behaviour which determines your main Behavioural traits
- Supporting Behaviour which will act as a backup Behaviour to your Leading Behaviour
- Supplementary Behaviour which can act to enhance your overall Behaviour
- Dormant Behaviour which will be the Behaviour that you ignore

Your MiRo results are based on the answers that you gave in your assessment, which is deliberately designed to force response based on habit and instinct. The results are shown on a pie chart which displays each of the Behaviours that are open to you in the order that you might habitually use them. Each Behavioural Mode will either be in an Engaged State, Disengaged State, Excess State or a Latent State.

The MiRo Behaviours Mode Summary Model

- There are no right or wrong Modes of Behaviour each one is valid given the individual and the environment.
- Modes do not relate to skills, ability or knowledge in any way.
- No Mode is unhealthy unless used to Excess.
- Although we lead with one particular Mode of Behaviour, through conscious effort we have access to all four modes.

Engaged Behaviour

Behavioural Modes that are Engaged are the ones that we use in normal life. At least one Mode will be Engaged. Supporting and Supplementary Modes can also be Engaged, if so they are in more or less frequent use and are reasonably comfortable for us.

Disengaged Behaviour

Behavioural Modes that are Disengaged are used on occasion but are less natural for us. It may be that in certain circumstances we use these particular behaviours, and of course we can do that, but given a free choice we tend to use the Engaged Modes.

Excess Behaviour

Some Behavioural Modes can be in Excess. If this is the case then they are still Engaged, however, it indicates an over reliance on one particular Mode. It naturally follows that the other Modes will be almost completely ignored in their turn. This can signify that you are under pressure or facing some kind of issue in your working or personal life.

Latency Behaviour

One Behavioural Mode may occur as being Latent. This indicates that you almost never consciously use this Mode. It does not, however, mean that you cannot but it is probably extremely uncomfortable for you to do so. This can cause problems not only in your relationship with other people but may indicate a poor relationship with yourself in some way.

Driving Mode Leading/Engaged

As someone who leads with Driving Mode your primary focus is on the task and your will to succeed at whatever you're doing. You can be adventurous and self starting and, as the name suggests, you can drive others to be their best and take a strong leading role when needed. You do not trust others easily but will generally have confidence in your own ability to get what you need from a situation regardless. You do this by using your not inconsiderable problem solving abilities and willingness to accept a challenge. You can be competitive and enjoy winning, and as a leader will probably have little time for those who do not feel the same way and will not suffer fools gladly. It is your personal drive and energy that tend to carry the day despite a certain lack of attention to detail.

You are fluid in your thinking and interested in ideas, always open to innovative and exciting ways of thinking about old problems. Your interest in the new is, however, likely to cause you to become bored easily when a more steady and detailed approach is needed. You are also likely to rely on a matter of fact, rational understanding of the world and as a result you can see the human aspects of a problem as a hindrance to getting things done. When excited by a project or an idea, though, you are apt to throw yourself into things whole heartedly and your willingness to take risks can often get results where others might not. You take pride in your objectivity and your ability to stay focused on results and see conflict as an occupational hazard rather than something to be avoided at all costs.

Others will see you as someone they can trust to get things done and are likely to think of you as clever. Your ability to take control and take quick and decisive action when the team is under pressure will generally be appreciated. You will challenge others as much as you challenge yourself, driving them to go the extra mile. Your unwillingness to take things at face value or to accept the orthodox view will also be a boon to any team of which you are a part. Your manner may be seen as abrasive on occasion, however, and your willingness to accept conflict may not be shared by others. Your direct approach will generally get you through nonetheless, as others will generally see you as being open and straight forward.

On a bad day your directness may become over confidence and impatience with others. You can be argumentative and, on a really bad, day even aggressive. You can be seen as restless and may not follow through on tasks that you begin; your low boredom threshold may lead you to become indifferent and occasionally condescending to people that you think are wasting your time or just 'not getting it'. Your will to win can also translate as a fear of failure which can lead you to become rigid and unreceptive to the ideas of others.

Your true strength, however, is in your pioneering spirit. You are straight talking and someone with the ability to act autonomously, to take the lead in a crisis and to get results when the chips are down.

Summary

- Motivated by: Control and success
- Anxiety: Failure
- Management Style: Autocratic
- Communication Style: Direct

Organising Mode Supporting/Engaged

Alongside your leading behavioural mode you also have access to the Organising Mode. This may sometimes take the lead itself and can even be used as your main form of interaction with the world over quite extended periods of time. This supporting mode gives you another set of possibilities as to how you might deal with people or situations.

When using Organising Mode your primary focus is on the here and now and maintaining harmony and stability in the world. You are generally quiet and unassuming and acutely aware of how your own wellbeing and that of others is affected by the immediate environment. You tend to be trusting of others and see the world as a generally benign place but a potentially fickle one over which you have little power. As a result of this view you seek security and a level of control over your environment. In order to achieve this you deploy your considerable organisational skills and sensitivity to the needs and feelings of others. You are genuinely supportive of others and although occasionally overly resistant to change you can be a steadying and calming influence in any team.

On the down side, when using this mode you can often become so bogged down in wanting to get things right that you lose sight of the need for adaptability in an ever changing world. This resistance to change can be perceived by others to be awkwardness or unreasonableness.

Used judiciously, and balanced with your leading mode, your Organising Mode can enable you to demonstrate great patience and focus, which are enormous strengths, along with your genuine care for others and formidable organisational skills.

Driving Leading / Organising Supporting Engaged

This combination of behavioural modes in the engaged zone signifies a tendency to be driven and results oriented despite resistance from others. You seek tangible, observable outcomes, thrive on pressure and can deal with problems in a fast paced working environment when deadlines are looming.

General Attributes

- Has a strong drive for achievement
- Seeks to better him/herself
- Enjoys a challenge
- Will work co-operatively but will take the initiative
- Has an assertive approach
- Will be persistent in their pursuit of goals
- Has a firm yet discreet approach to management
- An active listener when interested in others
- Will work on a personal level
- Will work systematically to achieve success
- Will make a decision and stick to it
- Hard working and will prefer to organise their own work

To maximize your Driving potential

- Negotiate freedom to act autonomously within your areas of competence.
- Seek new challenges and set yourself goals and targets.
- Seek to reduce routine work as far as possible in order to concentrate on your areas of strength.
- Ask for help. Get support with administrative and organizational tasks. □
- Deal with others on a one-to-one basis where possible.
- Encourage others to be open and frank. Cultivate a non defensive attitude.

To maximize your Organising potential

- Seek work with unambiguous objectives and realistic timescales.
- Keep contact with others whenever possible and let them know what you are doing and what you need from them.
- Be prepared for conflict as an inevitable part of life, but avoid work where confrontation and conflict are commonplace.
- Learn to prioritise effectively, particularly during times of extreme pressure or when working to deadlines.
- Ask for Help. Seek support and encouragement during periods of change or instability.
- Take time to cultivate reliable relationships with others and share and celebrate your successes.

Analysing Mode Supplementary/Engaged

Analysing Mode is the third of your behavioural modes in an engaged position, which means that you have some access to this mode too in daily life. It is likely, however, that this is fairly unnatural for you and may even feel forced on occasion. You might be spreading yourself a little thin in fact.

Used wisely Analysing Mode can enable you to stay calm and focused while all around you might be losing their heads. It can enable you to focus on detail and give you an insight into exactly how things work, enabling you to offer rational solutions to problems and a real attention to the specifics of a situation. By using this mode you can improve the systems by which you and others work.

It's as well to be careful, however, as you might be prone to using this mode more out of anxiety than as a reasoned response to circumstances, causing you to over compensate and become too focused on detail. You might become over rigid in your thinking and might even be perceived as a little fanatical. Faced with the inevitable conflicts that will arise, you are likely to retreat into your more comfortable leading mode.

Energising Mode Dormant

The least used of your behavioural modes in the Energising Mode. It is likely that you barely use this mode at all, consciously at least. If you do need to use it you are likely to find it fatiguing and extremely awkward. That's not to say it's not worth taking a break from your usual modes of behaviour from time to time and trying out some of the behavioural habits of the Energisers who may appear flighty, unfocused and self centred to you but who are, at best, bringers of optimism, creativity and energy to the world.

Communicating with Driving Mode Leading / Organising Mode Supporting Engaged

When using Driving Mode your communication will be assertive and rational. You will generally explain the logic behind your ideas and show a clear path to the end result. At work you will prefer a business-like tone and want others to be short and to the point. It will be important for you that others show that they have thought rationally about the path to success but also that they avoid too much detail. Others may find your style very matter of fact and sometimes a little impersonal. You will occasionally need to soften your approach if you are to meet your objectives. You can be authoritative and direct but will probably be respected for your honest and no-nonsense approach.

When using Organising Mode your communication will be considered and empathic. You will be seen as a good listener with a considered approach. Your responses will be matter of fact as you do not see the need to dress up what you have to say. Overall you will be looking for certainties in what you say and only state the things that you know. This may come across to others as an unwillingness to commit and could cause some frustration. However, most will see you as being supportive and easy going and once you see a step by step approach you will engage with others in a very empathic manner.

To communicate effectively with others you will need to modify your natural communication style in the following ways:

When communicating with people who lead with The Energising Mode

- Discuss what effect your plan will have on people.
- Talk in concepts and broad ideas.
- Acknowledge their contribution and that of others.
- Avoid heavy detail and keep to the big picture.
- Allow them to participate as fully as possible in the process.

When communicating with people who lead with The Driving Mode

- Show that you have an objective and a plan to achieve it.
- State your timetable and include milestones.
- Avoid heavy detail and keep to the point.
- Present your logic and avoid assumptions.
- Present your case in statements rather than convoluted arguments.

When communicating with people who lead with The Organising Mode

- Show a strategy of cooperation and talk about how you will reach the goal together.
- Focus on people and what ideas will do for them and their environment.
- Don't focus on change but rather on how good will be preserved.
- Present in a step by step manner and explain how and why things will happen.
- Give them time to think and don't rush them into decisions.

When communicating with people who lead with The Analysing Mode

- Keep the process formal and don't get too personal.
- Keep focus on task and show how you have arrived at your conclusions.
- Don't hide anything and discuss all the pros and cons.
- General ideas will need to be accompanied by fact.
- Do your homework.

Development of Behavioural Modes

Although we may favour a particular Behavioural Mode, it does not necessarily follow that we are completely fluent in its use. In the normal course of growing up, however, we develop confidence in our Leading Mode and may even develop an Engaged Supporting Mode. This is likely to take some conscious effort though, and in a working context may mean accessing particular kinds of training. An Engaged Supplementary Mode is never likely to be as natural to us as the higher two but can also, with practice, become an important part of our functioning. We are called upon too to use our Dormant Mode from time to time and even though we are probably better off working to our strengths, a little practice here can help us to work at our very best in a changing environment. It is also worth noting that an over reliance on our Leading Mode can leave us vulnerable to stress and even complete emotional breakdown.

Developing the Driving Mode

- Seek new challenges and projects where process and outcomes are uncertain.
- Set yourself targets and, where appropriate, play to win.
- Make decisions.
- Learn to delegate effectively.
- Learn to be assertive.
- Think laterally and trust your intuition
- Take risks

Developing the Energising Mode

- Seek interaction with people and get involved in people-based problem solving.
- Motivate others to succeed and be a team player.
- Involve others in decision making
- Learn better communication skills
- Learn to use body language and non verbal skills.
- Be creative and try out new ideas.
- Be open

Developing the Organising Mode

- Seek projects that need to be well planned, prioritised and structured.
- Help others to feel comfortable and take care of the human environment.
- Manage your time.
- Learn active listening skills
- Learn a specialised skill
- Be self-organising
- Be kind

Developing the Analysing Mode

- Seek projects involving critical analysis and systems design or improvement.
- Use your diplomacy skills to negotiate potential conflict.
- Analyse and weigh available data when making decisions.
- Learn a technical skill.
- Learn to plan strategically.
- Be aware of yourself and your environment.
- Stay calm.
